

The Nigerian State Security Apparatus and the Jonathan Regime

This study posed and answered the research question to what extent did the Jonathan Regime use the state security apparatus to maintain regime security. The premise of this study's framework is that President Jonathan and the Jonathan Regime's security was contingent on the Regime's ability to control the five core components of the state security apparatus: (1) the Political Security Component, (2) the Economic Security Component, (3) the Internal Security Component, (4) External Security Component, and (5) the Intelligence Security Component. The framework evaluated the extent that Regime security was dependent on the dynamic relationship between the key core concepts: regime, security, strategic intelligence, state security apparatus, threats, intelligence ethics, security, ideology, and ripe moments. This study examined the extent that previous Nigerian Regimes influenced the Jonathan Regime's use of the state security apparatus to maintain its Regime security. The research revealed that the Jonathan Regime used the state security apparatus successfully to maintain Regime security. The Regime's use of the state security in response to threats was consistent with this framework.
