Not illustrated. 1916 edition. Excerpt: ...on the others. When the avenue traffic is halted at the controlling street, a master stanchion or semaphore is set at stop at that street and a similar signal is at once displayed at each of the other cross streets, so that there is free movement across the avenue at all of the streets within the section. When the delayed vehicles at the controlling cross street have been passed, the go signal is displayed at each crossing and there is free movement along the avenue for the entire unit of control. The periods during which traffic is stopped on the cross streets vary from 90 to no seconds and on the avenue from 40 to 50 seconds. It is estimated that the adoption of the larger unit of control has reduced the average time required for a motor car to travel the 1.7 miles along Fifth avenue between Twenty-sixth and Fifty-eighth streets by from four to five minutes. When the regulation of traffic was first undertaken the efforts of the police were chiefly directed to stopping vehicles, but, as they have gradually become more proficient and have acquired a better appreciation of the real purpose of traffic control, their aim has been to keep the traffic moving. The raised hand to direct a stop is less frequent, while the arm motion to go ahead is more often seen. The same results are noticeable in the movement of the surface cars. On a very busy street in Brooklyn, where there is a constant procession of cars, many of which loop about a triangular block and return, the round trip time from one point to this loop and back, a total distance of one and a quarter miles, has lately been reduced from 24 to 19 minutes. The varying custom in different cities, and even in the same city, as to the side of the cross street at which...
